China Rewrites Its Mobilization Law to Seize Civilian Industry for a Taiwan War, as Islamabad Says All Its Military Means Are Available to Saudi Arabia and the EU Weighs a Trade Weapon Against Beijing

Strategic Brief

September 30, 2026

The Bottom Line

Today's developments point to states preparing their legal and industrial bases for wider conflict rather than narrowing disputes. China revised its mobilization rules to seize civilian industry for a potential Taiwan war, while the EU edged toward a 301-style trade weapon that Beijing has pledged to answer. Pakistan publicly offered its full military means to Saudi Arabia against the Houthis, converting the Mecca Pact from paper into a potential active commitment, and Washington sanctioned 10 more enablers of Iran's weapons supply chain as talks with Tehran stayed stalled. The common thread is pre-positioning: Beijing legalizing economic mobilization, Brussels arming its trade enforcement, and Islamabad signaling it will fight alongside Riyadh. Each raises the cost of any escalation and shrinks the room for quiet de-escalation.
