The Bottom Line

Three developments dominated the strategic picture. Washington announced an unprecedented energy arrangement with Venezuela that, if realized, would give the U.S. an effective 55 percent stake in a company holding 65 billion barrels of proven reserves — a hedge against Gulf disruption while it fights Iran. In a historic succession, King Haakon VIII took the Norwegian throne after the death of King Harald V, reshaping the public face of a NATO ally and key European energy supplier. And the catastrophic glacial floods on the Nepal-China border passed 570 dead, with a new lake threatening further inundation. Together they reflect a day defined less by breakthrough diplomacy than by the consolidation of U.S. energy power, a generational change in European leadership, and the human cost of a changing climate — set against an Iran war now six months old and showing no off-ramp.
