NATO Summit Floods Defense Industry With Announcements — From ATACMS in Germany to F-35s for Turkey

Defense Brief

July 08, 2026

The Bottom Line

The NATO summit in Ankara served as a catalyst for a wave of defense procurement decisions that had been building for months: Saab won the alliance's AWACS replacement, Lockheed and Rheinmetall will build ATACMS in Europe, Turkey is back in the F-35 conversation, and eight nations committed to networking their military satellites. But the day's other stories — 12-year average delays on Pentagon programs, $97 billion in combined munitions requests, and China testing a submarine-launched missile over a nuclear-free zone — underscore the gap between the urgency of the threat environment and the speed at which defense systems are actually delivered.
