US-Iran Ceasefire Collapses as Hormuz Traffic Dries Up, Ukraine Chokes Russia's Sea Lines, IMF Cuts Global Growth

Strategic Brief

July 10, 2026

The Bottom Line

The US-Iran ceasefire that took effect on June 17 is functionally dead. Trump declared it 'over'; Iran's response has been to strike US-linked targets across three Gulf states and assert unilateral control over Hormuz, where daily ship transits have fallen from 130 to 23. Neither the military escalation nor the diplomatic collapse shows a clear off-ramp — the MoU's vague language on the strait was always the deal's weakest point, and both sides have now moved past it. Separately, Ukraine's naval drone campaign has hit 25+ Russian vessels in four days, tightening the squeeze on Russian fuel logistics at a moment when domestic shortages are already acute. The IMF's growth cut to 3% assumed Hormuz would reopen this month; that assumption now looks optimistic. And China's expanding anti-sanctions regime is forcing multinationals into an untenable position between Washington and Beijing.
